Ice work if you can get it

We go glacier caving in Alaska

The promise of an aqua-coloured underworld beneath an Alaskan glacier led Yvonne Gordon on a thrilling, iceberg-dodging journey.

Forget fear: go with the flow

On a glacier four days before, Lapham Adventure Guides (Lapham.com) led us up the side of a lake, into a cave, through a tunnel, and to a fjord. It was a procession of explorers, each one with their own set of skills and gear. We were there to experience the thrill of glacial travel, and we were not disappointed.

As we made our way through the snow and ice, we were greeted by an incredible view of the surrounding landscape. The ice was so blue that it almost looked like water. The sight was breathtaking, and we knew that we had to continue.

As we progressed, we encountered several challenges. We had to climb over a small ridge, Peter was the first to do it. He was followed by two guides — Michael and Cameron. They carefully coached us through the climb, making sure that we were all safe.

We also had to navigate through a series of crevasses, which were deep holes in the ice. The guides used a combination of tools and caution to ensure our safety. They helped us to avoid falling into the crevasses, which could have been deadly.

As we continued, we saw several humpback whales coming up to the surface. They were swimming towards us, and we were able to see them clearly. It was an incredible experience.

Eventually, we reached the Mendenhall Glacier, which was just a short distance away from the lake. The guides led us through a series of tunnels and crevasses, and we were able to see the ice up close. The ice was so blue that it almost looked like water.

The guides also showed us the ice caves, which were filled with light. They explained that the ice caves were formed by the movement of the glacier, and that they were constantly changing. We were able to see the ice caves in all their glory, and we were impressed by the beauty of the scenery.

As we continued, we saw several people out on the ice. They were enjoying the scenery, and they were also taking pictures of the ice and the glaciers. We were able to join them, and we were able to take some amazing pictures of the ice and the glaciers.

As we made our way back to the lake, we saw several seals coming up to the ice. They were basking in the sun, and they were enjoying the scenery. We were able to see them clearly, and we were impressed by the beauty of the scenery.
